Also ... Did you buy a new iPhone expecting a massive AI upgrade that never arrived? You might be owed money! In today's deep dive ... U.S. consumers who purchased Apple devices in recent years face a tightening window to join a pending class-action lawsuit, as the court-mandated claim-form deadline approaches. The suit, filed in federal court, alleges that certain Apple products failed to meet advertised performance standards, and thousands of potential claimants must submit documentation before the cut-off date to preserve any right to compensation. The deadline is not merely procedural; it determines who can participate in any eventual settlement or judgment. Once the filing period ends, individuals who missed the window are barred from collective relief and must pursue separate legal avenues, which are often more costly and less certain. The urgency reflects the court's effort to finalize the class definition and move the case toward resolution.
