roughly ten weeks of instruction plus a week for finals. Unlike semester-based schools, this structure compresses content, making early preparation essential. Understanding key dates—registration windows, add/drop deadlines, and mid-quarter breaks—provides the baseline for any optimization effort. Traditional planning often relies on a simple “list-and-register” method: pick required courses, add a favorite elective, and hope the timetable works out. This can lead to back-to-back labs, overlapping office hours, and missed campus opportunities. Optimized scheduling treats the calendar as a puzzle. It aligns high-impact weeks (e.g., project due dates) with personal energy peaks, spaces out intensive labs, and reserves buffer days for review. The result is a balanced workload that mirrors a well-timed rhythm rather than a frantic sprint.
