etiquette, and typical pitfalls equips everyday citizens with the confidence to navigate the process without unnecessary setbacks. The trial day begins long before the judge enters the courtroom. Most Denver County courts open at 8:30 a.m., and security checkpoints require a valid ID and, occasionally, a brief bag search. Missing the check-in window can delay the entire docket, so arriving 30 minutes early is advisable. Once inside, the layout is predictable: the bench at the front, counsel tables facing each other, a jury box to the side, and the public gallery behind a low railing. This exacting arrangement helps participants locate their stations quickly and reduces the chance of procedural objections. Colorado's Rules of Civil Procedure require both sides to exchange evidence, witness lists, and expert reports well before the trial date. Failing to meet these deadlines forces the court to issue "continuance" orders, stretching the timeline and inflating legal costs.
