over months rather than weeks. The plan divides a typical week into three distinct blocks: Skill Sessions, Competitive Matches, and Recovery Time. Each block is assigned a fixed duration—45-minute theory drills, 2-hour tournament slots, and a 30-minute cooldown—mirroring proven productivity rhythms from sports science. By anchoring these activities to the same days each week, players develop muscle memory not just for cards, but for the habit of pacing themselves. Integration with the game's built-in calendar allows automatic reminders, ensuring no session is missed or overlapped. The plan also uses a "balance score" that tallies hours spent and suggests adjustments; if a player logs too many competitive matches, the algorithm nudges them toward an extra recovery slot. Map out the upcoming seven days in the Pokerogue app, labeling each hour according to the three blocks. Start each Skill Session with a single focus—e.g., bluff detection—rather than a vague "practice" goal.
